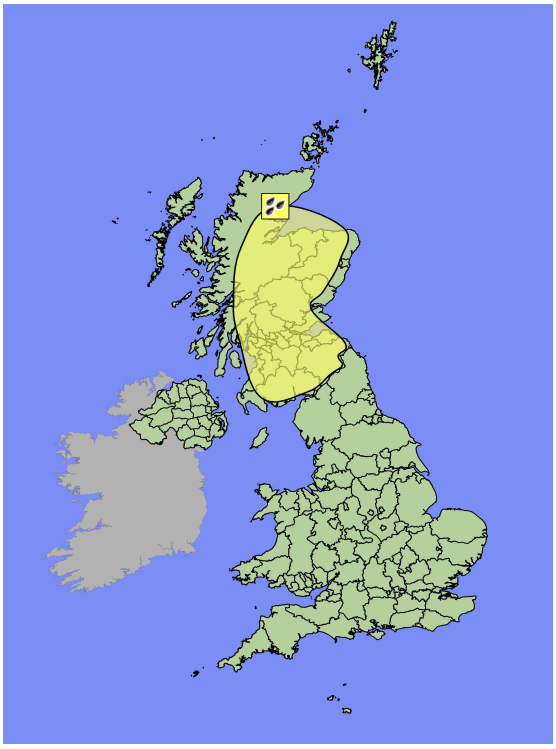
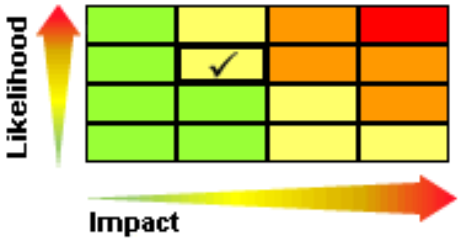
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Low pressure is expected to drift towards Scotland on Friday and become centred over the country on Saturday, with the potential for showers to become slow-moving and heavy. As is normal in showery situations there will be large variations in rainfall amounts within short distances, with many locations missing the worst of the rain. It will remain cold enough for further snowfall over the highest mountains. Given the uncertainties regarding where the heaviest showers will develop the public are advised to keep up to date with warnings over the coming days.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 00:00 on Fri, 20th Apr 2012 until 21:00 on Sat, 21st Apr 2012

Slow-moving showers will affect parts of Scotland during Friday and Saturday. Although there is some uncertainty regarding where the worst of the showers will develop, there is potential on Friday and Saturday afternoons for some heavy downpours. The public should be aware that localised surface water flooding and difficult driving conditions may result.
